THE NEW LANDSCAPE

Political analysts widely predicted that Democrats would gain several seats in the House of Representatives and that Republicans would retain and possibly increase their majority in the Senate. The forecasts have proven true. Additionally, as expected, Democrats picked up several gubernatorial seats and state legislatures.

In a historical context, it is highly unusual for the President's party to lose seats in one chamber of Congress while gaining seats in the other. The last time this took place was in the midterm election of 1982 under President Ronald Reagan (-26 House seats, +1 Senate seat).

The details of the election results and the party breakdowns for the 116th Congress are detailed in the pages below. Several states still have outstanding ballots and votes to be counted, so official numbers may change in the coming days and weeks. Additionally, states and jurisdictions have varying procedures surrounding runoff elections, counting provisional and absentee ballots, and recounts which could further delay results in several races.

Although we will see dozens of new faces in Congress next year, the 115th Congress still has work to complete. Members will return to Washington, D.C. on November 13 to begin the lame duck session. Several important legislative items remain to be addressed by lawmakers before Congress adjourns for the December holidays.

Troutman Sanders Strategies will provide an additional report in the coming days describing the lame duck to-do list, a policy outlook for the 116th Congress, and what changes we can expect to see in congressional leadership and committee makeup.

Thank you,

HOUSE ELECTION RESULTS

House Democrats will hold at least 222 seats in the lower chamber, gaining a net of 27 seats at minimum. Republicans, meanwhile, will hold at least 196 seats. Several races remain undecided or too close to call, but Democrats are expected to expand on their new majority. Several Democratic House pickups came from suburban districts in states like New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia.

Below you will find a table detailing dozens House races across the country that were considered among the most competitive by Cook Political Report and Sabato's Crystal Ball. The indexes and ratings are up to date as of November 7. Of these competitive races, Democrats flipped 19 districts that President Trump won in 2016, while Republicans flipped six districts that Hillary Clinton won.

Please note that some official House race results are still pending with votes outstanding and some of the data may change.

SENATE ELECTION RESULTS

Republicans will retain their majority in the Senate in the 116th Congress. Republicans will control at least 51 seats in the new Congress compared to at least 46 for Democrats (including two Independents caucusing with the Democrats).

The race in Arizona has not officially been called and there will be a runoff election in Mississippi on November 27. However, Republicans are currently leading in both of those races, putting the likely total seats in the Senate up to 53 for Republicans. Additionally, the Florida Senate race will go to a recount. Former Governor Rick Scott is leading against incumbent Senator Bill Nelson by less than half a percentage point, which is the threshold for a state-mandated recount.

Republicans were able to flip at least three seats held by Democrats; Indiana, Missouri, and North Dakota. They may flip Florida as well. Democrats, conversely, were only able to flip the Republican-held seat of Nevada but could still potentially flip Arizona. The Republican gains all come from states that President Trump won in 2016 while the one Democratic pick up comes in a state won by Hillary Clinton.

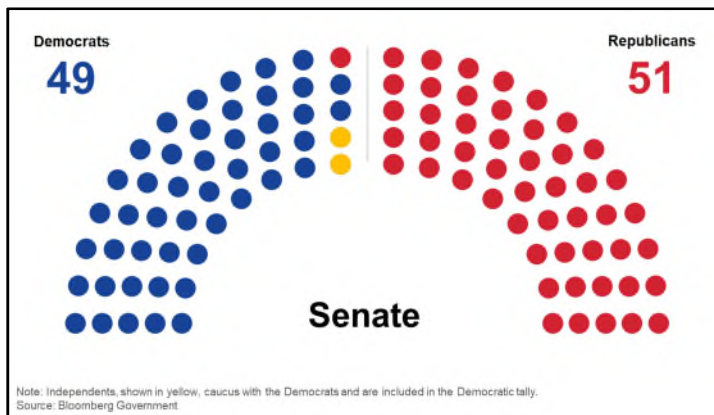

Overall, Republicans did much better in the upper chamber than many political forecasters and analysts predicted. A full table of the Senate races and the results is below.

SENATE PRE-ELECTION

SENATE POST-ELECTION

GOVERNORS ELECTION RESULTS

As expected, Democrats gained ground across the nation's governors mansions. As November 7, Democrats will control at least 23 governorships and Republicans will control at least 25. Democrats flipped at least seven governor's seats in Illinois, Kansas, Maine, Michigan, Nevada, New Mexico, and Wisconsin.

The Alaska and Georgia gubernatorial races have not officially been called. As of November 7, the Republican candidates were winning in both races.
